So for an example, a five years ago, it cost somewhere in the $150 million of $20 billion to get on the internet. If you think about that, if you bought each of the top ten songs of the year, it would cost you $150 million to hear them for the first time. And then this year, it's only $1.50 to get on the internet; your first song cost you one-fiftieth of what it did a few years ago. That's something that's never happened before. And that's created a lot of demand for artists. We think that's the reason we've seen these incredible, incredible numbers across all the different markets around the world, and the people who are now able to get heard and to be successful in these markets, we think that some of that has just to do with the way that people go to find and share things. And that's really a great thing for us, but it also means that it's a little bit harder to manage the supply of things, because it seems like there's always something new. And we've obviously, in the last few years, seen the beginnings of how the music industry is going to manage the supply, and it's all to do with the significant developments of digital music. Well, we're getting to the point where it's going to be very hard to continue to grow the business, because we're getting to a place where we're going to be outspent by the record labels, just in the sheer number of people who are acquiring music now. And the problem for the labels in that, is that the people who are buying music don't want to buy just music. They want to buy music and a million other things. And so they're making attempts, they're making businesses, to try and integrate into that and to add things to that. That's what's happening with the radio business, and the TV business, and, frankly, it's 9df0af710a
